Gov. Tilden in New York.

The democratic torchlight procession last evening was one of the grandest demonstrations of its kind ever witnessed in this city. Although the matter of banners and transparencies here was not the lavish display that characterized the famous turnout of the followers of Tammany Hall in November, 1868, the numbers in the procession were fully as great and the enthusiasm far more intense and sincere. The procession was managed with great skill, and not an event occurred from the time it started till the last club had passed the grand stand at Union square to mar the harmony and good order of the occasion. Probably there has never been a political demonstration since that of 1868 which drew together so vast a crowd. The sidewalks of the streets through which it was known that the procession would pass were literally packed with people fully an hour before the hour fixed for the beginning of the march had arrived, while every spot was black with the crowds that had sized upon them as coigns of vantage whence a good view of the pageant could be obtained. Several houses on the route were brilliantly illuminated in honor of the occasion, the Manhattan Club being especially distinguished for the magnificence of its display, every window of the huge mansion being lit up with a row of gas jets, while over the main entrance the letters "M. C." intertwined in jets, made the street in the immediate vicinity as bright as day.

The enthusiasm of the people along the route while the procession was in motion was intense, and from the time the immense array began its march the cheering was incessant; from block to block the cheers rolled along like the waves of the ocean. It was at Union square that the crowds were the greatest. The grand stand was directly in front of the Everett House, facing the park, and was made brilliant by several beacon lights, which lit up the entire plaza from end to end. It would be falling far short of the mark to call the mass of people that were congregated in the square a crowd. I was a multitude. Such a gathering has never been seen in the square in many years. As far as the eye could reach—and the square was lit up on all sides by the fireworks and the beacon lights—there stretched out on all sides a compact mass of human beings so tightly wedged together that even the large force of police that were on hand to preserve order and make a way for the procession were unable for a long time to make the slightest impression upon it in the way of cutting out a pathway. Even the grand stand at a sudden surge of the crowds in the rear pitched the people to the ground against it. The police several times were swept off their feet, and disappeared bodily under the stand with several others, whose misfortune it was to be so near that resistance to pressure from behind was more child's play. As the head of the procession was seen debouching from Fourteenth street into the square the crush in the plaza became so piteously dangerous, and at one time it seemed as though there would be loss of life from the crush. Happily the multitude were, though it was suffering untold agony from their situation, in good humor, and each one tried his best to make his neighbor's tortures as endurable as possible by making as much elbow room as could be. The desire to give Governor Tilden a hearty greeting appeared to make every one oblivious to self. When he finally made his appearance on the street the scene that ensued was absolutely indescribable. The moment he was desisted, attended by the marshals, coming out of the Everett House, a great rush toward him was made by the crowd in the rear of the stand, which taxed the energy of the police to its utmost to repel, while the cheers that greeted him were hearty, ringing cheers that showed that the crowds were in down to earth earnest in their welcome.

The multitude in the plaza, on hearing the cheers of the crowd near the hotel knew what they meant, and as they could not see the Governor, their expectation was made all the greater. So, when he finally reached the stand and came forward on the platform the enthusiasm knew no bounds. Such cheering was never heard in New York before. It was not one, two or three cheers by which he was greeted as he stood hat in hand, bowing his acknowledgments, but one long series of cheers that appeared to run together, one into the other, each more vociferous than the other. If any one present ever before doubted the enthusiasm that has been excited over Tilden among the democratic masses, his doubts must have been swept to the winds as he witnessed the exciting scenes about him and heard the cheering that rolled up and down the square, and that even before crossing for an instant was caught up by the crowds afar off on Broadway and Fourth avenue, who to find additional volume as it rolled back whence it had started.

The procession took over two hours and a half passing a given point, and its march step was as a rule, a rapid one. The telling motion on the banners of the various clubs, the Goddess of Liberty and Brother Jonathan in their car called out repeated cheers as they passed the stand. The negro at the ball box with United States soldiers with fixed bayonets intimidating him from voting, the democratic ticket was heartily cheered amid cries of "South Carolina." The procession was a grand success in every particular.—New York Herald Friday.
